Additional information provided by the Seller regarding defects, or potential defects, to the property as declared on the previous page:

Information for the prospective purchaser

The average seller does not know enough about building to accurately declare the condition of the home being sold. Therefore, NABISA recommends that the seller should disclose all significant defects and declare "what they do not know". Such "unknowns" will typically be the condition of the roof covering, roof structure and hot water geyser installation. Diagnosis of the cause and solution of wall cracks and damp are also beyond the knowledge of the average seller.

It is always a wise decision for the prospective purchaser to commission an independent inspection if the seller, or the purchaser, is uncertain about the condition or compliance of any part of the property.

The following issues should be considered when the prospective purchaser is deciding whether to invest in an independent inspection as a condition of the proposed purchase:

- "Nobody's property is perfect": The average South African home consists of hundreds of different components and installations, many of which can impact on other parts of the structure. As a result of age, or bad workmanship, defects can be found in most buildings. An experienced and a trained home inspector, who is registered with NABISA, will have a sound all-round understanding of the overall South African built environment. This enables the NABISA registered home inspector to identify and evaluate significant defects observed in structures and, where necessary, recommend further investigation by an appropriate specialist. Such specialists may include, among others: Engineers (structural, roof or geotechnical), electricians, plumbers, builders, waterproofing experts, or paint specialists.
- The National Building Regulations and SA National Standards: These regulations and national standards are enforced by local authorities when new buildings are to be constructed. These regulations and standards are regularly updated but are seldom retroactive and therefore do not necessarily apply to existing structures, which may have been built years before the relevant regulation or national standard came into force. A good home inspector will evaluate compliance applicable at the time the home was built, evaluate the current condition of the structures, and often also take a view on the anticipated cost of necessary repairs or replacement of components.
- Certificates of Compliance: A property may require up to five different certificates of compliance (CoC) before ownership of the property can be transferred to a new owner. These CoC's are: Electrical, hot water heaters, gas, electrified fence, and "beetle" (wood destroying organisms). Electrical, electrified fence and gas installation CoC's are required by law for every property transfer. A plumbing CoC is required after the installation, relocation, or replacement of any electric or solar water heating system.
